Loss

One of the central themes of 'Blue Hour Poems' is loss. Forché writes about the loss of loved ones, the loss of innocence, and the loss of hope.

In the poem "The Garden," Forché writes about the loss of her father. She describes the garden where he used to work, and she remembers the way he would tend to the flowers. The poem is full of sadness and longing, but it also contains a sense of hope. Forché writes, "I will never forget the way you loved this garden, / and I will never forget the way you loved me."

In the poem "Elegy for a Young Friend," Forché writes about the loss of a young friend who died of cancer. The poem is full of grief and anger, but it also contains a sense of resilience. Forché writes, "I will not let your death be in vain. / I will carry your memory with me always, / and I will fight for the things you believed in."

Memory

Memory is another important theme in 'Blue Hour Poems.' Forché writes about the power of memory to both heal and wound. In the poem "Memory," she writes, "Memory is a strange thing. / It can be a comfort or a curse. / It can make us happy or sad. / It can make us who we are or who we were."

In the poem "The House on Mango Street," Forché writes about the memories of her childhood home. The poem is full of nostalgia and longing, but it also contains a sense of resilience. Forché writes, "I will never forget the house on Mango Street. / It was the place where I grew up, / and it was the place where I learned to love."

Resilience

Resilience is a recurring theme in 'Blue Hour Poems.' Forché writes about the ability of the human spirit to withstand even the most difficult challenges. In the poem "The River," she writes, "The river is always flowing, / no matter what obstacles it encounters. / It is a symbol of hope and resilience."

In the poem "The Tree," Forché writes about the strength of a tree that has survived a storm. The poem is full of hope and optimism. Forché writes,

"The tree has weathered many storms, / but it is still standing. / It is a symbol of resilience and strength."
