In his new book, Keeping the Republic, Newt Gingrich issues a clarion call to all Americans to reclaim their rightful role as the guardians of their own freedom and prosperity. With his signature blend of historical insight and political savvy, Gingrich argues that the time has come for a new American Revolution—one that will restore the principles of limited government, individual liberty, and free enterprise that made our nation great.

Gingrich begins by reminding us of the founding principles of our nation. Our Founding Fathers believed that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, including the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They also believed that government should be limited in its scope and power, and that the best government is one that governs least.

These principles have been under attack in recent years by those who believe that government can and should do more to solve our problems. They have argued that we need more government programs, more regulation, and more taxes. But as Gingrich shows, this approach has failed.

Government programs have not solved our problems. In fact, they have often made them worse. Regulation has stifled innovation and economic growth. And taxes have drained our wallets and made it harder for us to make ends meet.

It is time for a new approach. We need to return to the principles of limited government, individual liberty, and free enterprise. We need to trust Americans to make their own decisions and to live their own lives.

Gingrich offers a number of specific proposals for how we can achieve this goal. He calls for cutting taxes, reducing regulation, and reforming welfare. He also calls for a strong national defense and a balanced budget.

These proposals are not without their critics. Some argue that they are too radical. Others argue that they will not work. But Gingrich believes that they are essential if we want to save our republic.

As Gingrich writes, "The future of our republic depends on the choices we make today. Will we choose to continue down the path of big government and statism? Or will we choose to return to the principles of freedom and limited government that made our nation great?"

The choice is ours.
